Commercially manufactured trucks often have many thousands of pounds of capacity to perform their commercial function. Commercial manufacturers of trucks often have multiple sizes of trucks to provide a range of capacities, where the largest size having many more pounds of capacity than the smallest. The ratio of payload capacity to size of the vehicle plays an important role in determining which type of vehicle and which type of payload will perform best for a given application. Commercial manufacturers of trucks are often required to provide some form of certification or other measure of the performance of their products to the government in order to support or justify their products. The government can make changes to its requirements based on the performance of the certification program. Typically, the government will perform tests using conditions that approximate real-world use. Trucks are often used for moving a payload of material during the loading or unloading process in a warehouse. The loading or unloading process frequently entails multiple stages. First, a truck is taken to the unloading or loading site, where the truck is driven to a loading or unloading dock. Once at the loading or unloading dock,
